Have you heard that phrase, "I like animals more than I like people"? Well, there may be a reason for that, aside from being cute and entertaining almost all the time without even trying, the biggest reason people will open their hearts and homes to an animal is because of the companionship. Unlike human interaction, animals will be a listener, a cuddle friend or just a neutral support that brings a positive energy to those they love. They rarely talk back or dish out negative feedback and they don't hold grudges that long. Animals have often been utilized for work and therapy for centuries. They have been used in hazardous fields as a trusting partner and seem to have no bounds on their commitment to honor and love their human.

There has been a rise in senior facilities and hospitals using animals as comfort and support or a little ray of joy during some very challenging and transitional times. Studies have shown that blood pressure, depression and lifestyle outlooks can alter in a significant way when animals come into the picture.

Some of these facilities even have permanent animal residences. Sure, there is the cleanup and responsibility of feeding and addressing health needs, but most of these people have spent their lifetime doing this for so many that it's second nature to them. For those who have dementia or other neurological and memory issues they may not be able to take on all these responsibilities but they are able to still provide love and the fondness that the animal shares with them can be soothing their souls as well as stimulating neurological skills as well as keeping them engaged with the environment that they are in.

We are delighted to hear stories from our senior clients who look into adopting or rescuing older animals, the love they pour into their new family member, even with the mindfulness of thinking statistically in their golden years, it doesn't hold them back from this need to have the unconditional love, friendship and support that only animals can provide. We commend those of you who give and receive these tender moments even through the tough times.
